

To draw conclusions from the dataset, schools with populations lower than 3000 typically had higher averages of math and reading scores. However, spending amounts on schools did not have a strong impact on passing rates for schools. Another point to be made was the type of school showed an impact on passing scores as well. Between Charter schools and District schools - Charter schools had higher averages compared to District schools in reading and math rates.